DNA

Last year the Indiana Lawyer published an article about a law in Indiana that allows for authorities to take a DNA sample.

Indiana authorities are now required under state law to collect a DNA sample from those who are arrested for a felony crime. The law that took effect requires that police collect a DNA cheek swab, along with fingerprints and photographs, during the booking process. That will enable law enforcement to check a database for matches with DNA evidence gathered in other crimes.

The sample may be expunged from the system if an arrestee is acquitted, a charge is lowered below a felony, or if no charges are filed after a year. State legislators approved the law in April of 2017. Supporters contended it would help solve crimes, along with exonerating the innocent. Critics argued the DNA collection goes against the U.S. Constitution's protection from unreasonable search and seizure. With the change in law, Indiana joins the majority of states that collect DNA samples from felony arrestees.
